J. David Stark

'In this creative and competent study, J. David Stark investigates the hermeneutical paradigms underlying various forms of Second Temple Judaism and Paul's letter to the Romans. In so doing, he sheds important light on Jewish conceptions of the climactic enactment of the purposes of Abraham's God for his people.'

Andreas J. Köstenberger, Southeastern Baptist Theological Seminary, USA

'A theoretically informed discussion of the hermeneutical roles attributed to the Righteous Teacher and Messiah Jesus by the communities of the yahad and Roman church respectively, this study advances an approach to the comparative study of ancient Jewish and Christian sources that is both methodologically sophisticated and textually grounded. Stark argues that while both communities inhabited basically the same hermeneutical world, they would nevertheless have regarded each other as unfaithful to Yahweh.'

Timothy Lim, University of Edinburgh, UK

'J. David Stark demonstrates an impressive knowledge of the Qumran texts and the writings of the apostle Paul. He interacts well with primary sources as well as the vast amount of secondary literature on these topics. Those interested in hermeneutics, the Qumran community, or the influences on the apostle Paul, will benefit from reading this well-researched and well-written monograph. Stark has made an excellent contribution to the field of hermeneutics and New Testament studies.'

Benjamin L. Merkle, Southeastern Baptist Theological Seminary, USA

J. David Stark is eCampus Director at Faulkner University, USA. He has also written on the topic of Paul's relationship to rewritten biblical literature: 'Rewriting Prophets in the Corinthian Correspondence: A Window on Paul's Hermeneutic' Bulletin for Biblical Research 22, no. 2 (2012), pp. 225–49.
